The American School Counselor's Association (ASCA) offers detailed literature about the role of the school counselor. One of the major components of that role is accountability. School counselors are responsible for analyzing data on their own effectiveness and adjusting their techniques to maximize their value to students. As a result, the role of the counselor is ever-changing and depends on a variety of factors at work within the school. One of the most important recent changes to the school counselor's role is dealing with new forms of bullying, especially cyber bullying. Students of younger and younger ages are using technology for communication and socializing and by doing so are putting themselves at risk for a type of bullying that is difficult to deal with for both student and counselor. A school counselor must be aware of new social issues that constantly arise between students based on changing trends.
